

To persons with lived experience

Do you know someone who has had moments when (s)he considered ending her/his life?

We are trying to understand the complexity of suicide better to support those who are experiencing suicidal thoughts and those who have lost a loved one to suicide.

We are hoping to learn about the various factors which can help people change their mind and stay alive. And we are hoping to understand what has helped persons bereaved by suicide to cope with intense emotions (e.g. grief, anger, despair, guilt, disbelief) and questions left unanswered.

We are therefore looking for people who are willing to share their personal reflections on suicide prevention. Reflections can include experiences with the support they have received through friends and family, (psychotherapeutic) interventions, personal belief, (social) media, online platforms, etc. Submit your contribution to Intervention Journal by 31.01.2021: Call for Papers

To practitioners and academics

Are you working in the humanitarian field/development cooperation and are you engaged in activities for suicide prevention and response? We are looking for persons who are willing to share their insights from their academic or field work on steps that can be taken to help people stay alive.

These can include research findings, aspects of practice, systematic reviews, case studies, evaluations, lessons learned and recommendations from projects or training approaches. Submit your contribution to Intervention Journal by 31.01.2021: Call for Papers
